Film Has Increased Rather Than Hurt the Influence of the Drama.

Of all the interesting questions that have arisen since the birth of the photoplay art, probably the most interesting is that which has to do with the effect of the screen play on the spoken drama. Hardly a day passes but that some new argument is presented to prove that the screen has hurt the stage or the reverse. It is the usual habit of people who jump at conclusions to assert that the screen has burt the stage terribly. And they can bring plausible arguments to prove their contention. It is probably true that the presentation of old plays by poor stock ompanies has been burt by the careful manner in which these same plays are acted for the screen. It s the consensus of opinoin among the authorities of the dramatic and film world, however, that the screen has not burt the stage in any greater degree than the surgeon hurts the er degree than the surgeon hurts the patient from whose body he removes a growth that, if permitted to go on intrestrained, would sooner or later have killed. It might be said that in the same degree that modern social for vice has been an aid to a better democracy for the people, so the screen has helped the democracy of the drama. In a sense, the screen has provided a form of social service, it has been a haven for the poorthat great class of people who cannot afford what we have heretofore termed the higher forms of amusement, and have been compelled to take what their purses enabled them to buy.

There is no one whose knowledge of the situation is worth while, who will pretend that the kinds of amusement this class of people was able to provide for itself was of a helpful kind. It simply provided amusement. In the great plays that have been written for the stage there is something more than momentary amusement. The expense of production and of carrying a company capable of properly interpreting the hig thoughts of great authors made it impossible for the poor to avail themselves of the real educational uselves of the real educationa and recreative values of the theater. When the photopiay came along it provided just the medium to do this. The quality of the play improved-among a big class of producers. To-day the very best that the world af-fords in the way of instructive and constructive drama is none too good for the screen. Today books are for the screen. Today books are being placed before a great mass of people who never heard of them, by eans of the dramatization of means of the dramatization of the story on the screen. In many instances the screen has gone the book a shade better in that it made some famous characters of fiction human that were far from being so when confined between the covers of the books their authors wrote. In this direction alone, therefore, the world owes the screen a great debt. And in this sense it has re-lieved the stage of a burden and put out of business a cleap, tawdry satellite of the theatrical firmament that was a constant threat to both humanity as a whole and that section of it which has to do with the providing of the people's amusements. There will always be a marments. ket for the talent of the actor and actress who can put individuality wright who can write n in his lines, whether the lesson h served to an accompaniment of laughter or tears. In relieving the stage of the weight of cheap, trashy oductions which was dragging it pianes in popular esteem the screen has, therefore, performed a great service, just as the surgeon referred o performs a great service.

There has recently been another maker given to the people who have the fixed notion that the screen puris the stage. This came in a purious manner. It has been con-ended that a theater which utilized photopiay on its open would never again be able to at tract to its doors a respectable pa-tronage for the spoken drama. In New York last spring a beautiful playhouse was completed and turned presents was completed and turning over to one of the largest or the photoplay producers. The house was called the Candler and George Kleine, who became its manager, utilized it for the production of a produced were not sensational jea-tures of the type of "Cabiria" of or "The Last Days of Fom-or "Ben-Hur." They were ust average plays of the new kind kind that is of the very his type of amusement. All sun mer long this house was run as a moving picture theater. And it was filled all summer long. It became fully identified with the film and It was announced at the begin ning of the theater's career that when the regular theatrical season open the Candler would be given open to regular stage productions.

putation to continuously

Willis on Job With Federal Reserve Board

H Parker Willis, New York editor and financial expert, today took up his work as secretary of the Federal Re-serve Board. Mr. Willis was called into consultation frequently during the con-sideration in Congress of the currency ect, and had a part in framing the measure.

The board will have a session late this afternoon to take up the appointment of Class C directors, with the hope of making selections before the class of the week. Organization of the twelve reserve banks will be delayed until these directors are appointed.

Approval of the plan for a gold fund to meet American obligations in Europe s being held up pending the receipt of further suggestions from the committee headed by David R. Forgan, of Chicago, which proposed the plan. The action of the New York bankers in taking care of New York city's obligations of $80-000,000, members of the board believe, meets the immediate debts to pay which the gold fund had been proposed. An amended proposal from the Forein committee reducing the size of the original $150,000,000 fund planned in the light of the pool made up in New York is awarded by the reserve board before
